

I would like to express my disapproval of the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act (CALEA) I consider my activities online to be, by default, private and under the realm of "in the privacy of one's home". Although there is a slight possibility that government monitoring of personal communications may help prevent isolated terrorist acts, the threat to personal freedom would be nightmarish. All people have an innate fear of someone looking over their shoulder, whether they have something to hide or not... It's just rude. I get that feeling whenever I think of this proposed act... The last entity I want keeping records of everything I do, everywhere I go, everything I say is the government of the United States.
